

WHIO TV 7 and WHIO Radio reports that workers may experience lasting mental health effects following a shooting incident.

The DMAX manufacturing plant in Moraine was closed following a shooting that occurred on Thursday night. The incident was a result of a domestic feud between two male employees over a female worker. The shooting targeted specific individuals, but it could have a lingering impact on hundreds of DMAX workers.

by Delia Reynolds

7 hours ago

Synopsis

Clinical psychologist Dr. Kathy Platoni recommends providing access to mental health services for employees affected by the shooting. As Platoni stated, “Nobody’s going to get out of this unscathed, very sadly.” It is essential to take care of oneself and seek help when needed. She urged employees to speak up if they see something concerning, as this could prevent future incidents..

The DMAX manufacturing plant in Moraine was closed following a shooting that occurred on Thursday night. The incident was a result of a domestic feud between two male employees over a female worker. The shooting targeted specific individuals, but it could have a lingering impact on hundreds of DMAX workers. Clinical psychologist Dr. Kathy Platoni recommends providing access to mental health services for employees affected by the shooting. She also suggests self-care, establishing a routine, talking to trusted family and friends, and not being alone with the trauma. It may take a while for some workers to feel comfortable returning to the plant.

As seen on WHIO News, the DMAX manufacturing plant in Moraine, Ohio, was closed on Friday following a shooting incident that occurred on Thursday night. The incident was related to a domestic feud between two male employees over a female co-worker. While the shooting was targeted, it could have a lasting impact on hundreds of DMAX workers.

Clinical psychologist, Dr. Kathy Platoni, spoke with News Center 7 about the potential mental health impacts on employees returning to work following the incident. Platnoi emphasized the importance of providing access to mental health services for affected workers, as some may never feel safe returning to the building.

Platoni explained that employees who witnessed the shooting may experience shock, horror, grief, disillusionment, anger, rage, sadness, and disbelief. These emotions can be difficult to process and may require professional support to manage.

Self-care is also crucial for employees dealing with the aftermath of a traumatic event like a workplace shooting. Platoni advised establishing a routine, talking to trusted friends and family, and not isolating oneself with the trauma. Trauma is unforgettable, and brushing it off is not an option.

Platoni also noted that it could take some time for workers to feel comfortable returning to the DMAX plant. She urged employees to speak up if they see something concerning, as this could prevent future incidents.

The shooting at the DMAX plant is a tragic reminder of the importance of workplace safety and mental health support. Employers must prioritize the well-being of their employees and provide resources to help them cope with traumatic events. As Platoni stated, "Nobody's going to get out of this unscathed, very sadly." It is essential to take care of oneself and seek help when needed.

This article covers "WHIO TV 7 and WHIO Radio reports that workers may experience lasting mental health effects following a shooting incident.", in Health News. We Thrilled to bring you this exciting news and articles story. If you found it interesting, please share it with your friends to show your support. For more updates like this, follow Bollyinside on Facebook and Twitter. We promise to keep you informed and entertained